Q. All the testosterone and sophisticated friends that I have are always talking about type A personality? They seem to know all the answers, while I must confess my ignorance. Can you tell me something about it?

A. For some time, there was said to be a connection between human emotions, excess stress, inner conflicts and heart disease. From time immemorial, it has been suggested there is a relationship between highly stressful personalities and illness such as heart disease or chronic ulcers or colitis. A great many physicians no indeed believe that sometimes when overcontrolled, can play havoc with a human being.

Many books have been written about the type A behavior pattern. The general consensus is that a type A person is one who lives in a constant world of competitiveness with aggression to members of the family, friends and co-workers. Most type A personalities are overwhelmingly concerned about the need for underemployed work. There probably is no better description of such a person than the suggestion that they are running a race against time and always seem to be breathlessly trying to make a "deadline". Also, there is a sense of urgency. They are extraordinarily alert, very verbal, articulate and often explosively so. Type A personalities are highly competitive and are easily annoyed when their decisions are questioned. They constantly give evidence of their extreme drive and seem to have no sense of understanding of the emotional behavior patterns of their peers.

The real definition of the type A personality has evolved from psychological observations of many individuals who have developed chronic intestinal problems, stomach ulcers, and heart disease. Even though there is no exact way to quantify the relationship between stress, type A behavior and these physical disorders, it is generally agreed by psychological specialists, psychologists and psychiatrists that there is a distinct relationship between many physical ailments and the stress under which these people live.

Whether one is an antagonist of the idea or a protagonist of the relationship between stress and chronic physical disease, certainly it is beneficial to the type A person to learn, with behavior modification and with psychological guidance the value of modifying their inner relentless drive to accomplishment. The benefits that accrue to these people are limitless. It is an interesting observation that when the type A behavior personality learns to modify that incessant drive to accomplish everything now the total productivity of the human being is even greater when there is sensible reduction of the unnecessary stress under which the type A personality lives.

Three students to spend days with secretaries

On Tuesday, May 8 three students in Northern High School's Business Department will not be in their regular classes.

Instead, these students will be spending an entire day with secretaries at Memorial Hospital and Pilsus McLucas Reporting Service as part of an opportunity called a "Shadowing Experience".

Participants include Tracy Eshleman, Delane McMichael, and Chris Lanasky, all senior business students enrolled in Shorthand II courses.

In this program a student is assigned to one secretary or administrative assistant for one day. The student simply observes what the secretary does all day and asks planned questions.

Since the majority of students' education takes place in the classroom, students need to spend time in the office to ensure that they have selected the right career.

Later this month the business department is offering all seniors an opportunity to find a job - summer, part-time temporary or full time. Sixteen area businesses will be represented. The Job Fair will take place the morning of May 16 when senior students can visit and talk with company representatives in the high school cafeteria.

Shadowing Experience participants, Delane, Tracy and Chris.

Paint & Household

by Bob D'Angelo

Q. I painted a ceiling and used masking tape on the old wood molding for seamless. The ceiling is great. However, to my dismay, the tape is not coming off. The few pieces I have been able to remove are taking the varnish off as well. Can you help? P.W. Banville, N.Y.

A. The use of masking tape for trimming is quite common, especially since it's usually found in the paint department. We covered this problem in some past columns, but the solution bears repeating.

Nail polish remover or acetone will remove the masking tape, but will unfortunately continue to remove some of the molding varnish. Rub it in with steel wool, and carefully peel away.

Painter's tape is a product you should have used instead. It's smooth, as opposed to the rough texture of masking tape which allows some paint to run underneath, and the adhesive has long isn't as tenacious as the masking tape. Incidentally, the longer masking tape is allowed to remain on the surface, the harder to remove.

Q. Let me first begin by telling you that I enjoy your column very much. It is interesting, informative, and often witty and I am always looking forward to it. Please advise me about the following:

I live in an old house built of cinder blocks. The outside was once stuccoed and over the years was painted a couple of times.

Painting the house has to be done about every three years and at the moment, the paint is peeling very badly again. I would like to get away from painting now, as I have heard that there is something more permanent nowadays. Could you inform me about this "pressure painting?" Also whom should I seek out for such a job? T.L., Dix Hills, N.Y.

A. The "pressure painting" that you speak of is called elastomeric painting. This particular application is approximately 18 mil thick, compared to the three or four mil of conventional exterior paint. As with any other type of paint application it's only as good as the preparation beforehand.

The consistency of elastomeric paint is similar to soft ice cream, and it is sprayed on to achieve its thickness and that's about all I know of it. However if you will call Herb Ullman at Hollow Rock Paint ing (912-757-6363), he'll be able to advise you as they are one of the largest paint companies in the country and more familiar with it.
